

Chapter 67

Watch What You Wear: Smartwatches and Sluggish Security

Joseph Ricci

University of New Haven, USA

Ibrahim Baggili

University of New Haven, USA

Frank Breitinger

University of New Haven, USA

ABSTRACT

There is no doubt that the form factor of devices continues to shrink as evidenced by smartphones and most recently smartwatches. The adoption rate of small computing devices is staggering and needs stronger attention from the cybersecurity and digital forensics communities. In this chapter, we dissect smartwatches. We first present a historical roadmap of smartwatches. We then explore the smartwatch marketplace and outline existing smartwatch hardware, operating systems and software. Next we elaborate on the uses of smartwatches and then discuss the security and forensic implications of smartwatches by reviewing the relevant literature. Lastly, we outline future research directions in smartwatch security and forensics.

INTRODUCTION

Smartwatches have recently become a novel consumer product especially with the release of the Apple Watch, which has certainly galvanized the wearable-tech market. eMarketer, an independent market research company expects smartwatches will lure consumers away from fitness trackers - which is currently the most popular wearable device (eMarketer, 2015). Smartwatches process a variety of personal data, different from data processed by current smartphones, making the study of smartwatches from the security and forensics perspectives important.

Since the advent of smartphones, law enforcement, criminals, and organizations have been able to collect a plethora of personal data about their consumers allowing service providers and device manufacturers to profile their users. Smartphones can collect data such as shopping preferences, Global Positioning System (GPS) coordinates, weight, gender, and age just to name a few examples. Undoubtedly, people have become personally and emotionally attached to these devices (Thorsteinsson & Page, 2015). Notwithstanding, we have now entered the era of smartwatches as device factor continues to decrease in size. Now that smartwatches such as the Samsung Gear 2 Neo, LG G, and Apple Watch have a flourishing adoption rate and employ many of the similar capabilities as smartphones, one may ask the question What additional personal data are these smart devices able to collect and how safe is that data during transit and storage? We posit that smartwatches will become fully integrated personal digital assistants that not only will receive notifications from a one's smartphone but also monitor one's health.

DOI: 10.4018/978-1-5225-5484-4.ch067

Research on smartwatch security is sparse, which is why it is important to understand their functionality and their vulnerabilities. The security of data that is stored and transmitted from and to a smartwatch suggests that encryption is important to protect data from prying eyes. Identifying potential challenges may make users aware of the likely risks from using smartwatches and may assist in preventing sensitive data from being leaked. While we observe the size of smart devices shrinking over time, it is not difficult to imagine the possibility for smartwatches replacing smartphones one day.

In this chapter, we first outline the history of smartwatches, and the current smartwatch marketplace in an effort to familiarize the reader with this technology. Next, existing smartwatch hardware, operating systems and software are delineated to provide insight into how one could implement methods and technologies in smartwatch security and forensics. We then follow that with the uses of smartwatches to provide an understanding of how they operate. Then, the security implications of smartwatches are discussed, followed by a review of the preliminary forensic analysis research on smartwatches; exemplifying how one may forensically obtain digital evidence from them. Finally, future research directions related to smartwatch security and forensics is discussed.

THE ROAD TO SMARTWATCHES (HISTORY)

The advancement in digital technology typically targets two challenges:

1. Performance: Everything should be faster and better;
2. Form Factor: We continuously aim for building more compact devices.

The size of the digital computer has continued to shrink from the reprogrammable digital Electronic Numerical Integrator And Computer (ENIAC) that occupied an entire room, to the desktop, to the mobile smartphone which can fit in one's pocket. Paralleled with the decrease in size was the escalation in processing power and storage – instead of a few kilobytes of memory and a single core with a few hertz, we now have multi-cores and terabytes of memory.

Narrowing our focus to watches, we identify a similar trend. Many attempts to create a functional smartwatch were made between 1972 and 2013, with limited results. The earliest model of a computerized wristwatch was the Pulsar, launched in April 1972, which was the first ever wristwatch capable of storing data (Edwards, 2012). Even though the amount of data it could store was limited, one may view this as the preliminary step towards smartwatches as we know them today. Over time, manufacturers such as Sony, Casio, and Timex created digital wristwatches; devices that have a digital time display while providing extra features such as timers, a stopwatch and calendars. Additionally, some watches were 19 more pages are available in the full version of this document, which may be purchased using the "Add to Cart" button on the publisher's webpage:

www.igi-global.com/chapter/watch-what-you-wear/202022

Related Content

Trends and New Advances on Wearable and Mobile Technologies for Parkinson's Disease Monitoring and Assessment of Motor Symptoms: How New Technologies Can Support Parkinson's Disease

Jorge Cancela, Matteo Pastorino and Maria Teresa Arredondo Waldmeyer (2018). Wearable Technologies: Concepts, Methodologies, Tools, and Applications (pp. 1388-1412).

www.irma-international.org/chapter/trends-and-new-advances-on-wearable-and-mobile-technologies-for-parkinsons-disease-monitoring-and-assessment-of-motor-symptoms/202019

Remaking Ancient Virtues for the Virtual World: A Case Study of the "Voice of Longquan"

Fan Zhang (2015). International Journal of Interactive Communication Systems and Technologies (pp. 41-54).

www.irma-international.org/article/remaking-ancient-virtues-for-the-virtual-world/136851

Sustained Learning in 4th and 5th Graders but not 7th Graders: Two Experiments with a Talking Pedagogical Agent

Bruce L. Mann, Henry Schulz, Jianping Cui and Shannon Adams (2012). Educational Stages and Interactive Learning: From Kindergarten to Workplace Training (pp. 163-190).

www.irma-international.org/chapter/sustained-learning-4th-5th-graders/63063

Activity Recognition Using Ubiquitous Sensors: An Overview

Yunji Liang, Xingshe Zhou, Bin Guo and Zhiwen Yu (2018). Wearable Technologies: Concepts, Methodologies, Tools, and Applications (pp. 199-230).

www.irma-international.org/chapter/activity-recognition-using-ubiquitous-sensors/201961

Detection of Hands for Hand-Controlled Skyfall Game in Real Time Using CNN

Neha B., Naveen V. and Angelin Gladston (2020). International Journal of Interactive Communication Systems and Technologies (pp. 15-25).

www.irma-international.org/article/detection-of-hands-for-hand-controlled-skyfall-game-in-real-time-using-cnn/275193