ABSTRACT

In this study the key features of local self-government in the contemporary state will be analyzed and will be focused on European systems of local governance and particularly on Austria, Belgium, Czech Republic, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Poland, Sweden, Spain, The Netherlands and the UK. In this context the European Union will be referenced as an additional layer of governance above the state. In addition to a legal perspective, suggestions coming from other disciplines will be used such as, sociology, philosophy and especially political science. Main argument in this text is that a system of governance which includes strong local decentralisation is a good system of government fulfilling fundamental goals of constitutionalism.

INTRODUCTION

In this study I will analyse the key features of local self-government in the contemporary European state. I will focus on European systems of local governance and particularly on Austria, Belgium, Czech Republic, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Poland, Sweden, Spain, The Netherlands and the UK (cf. Table 1). In this context I will also make reference to the European Union, which is an additional layer of governance above the state. I will adopt a primarily legal perspective, but will also use insights originating in other disciplines, such as sociology, philosophy, and especially political science. I will argue that a system of governance which includes strong local decentralisation is a good system of government fulfilling fundamental goals of constitutionalism.
